

Three lessons from my first internship that nobody tells you:

1. Ask the "obvious" question. The senior engineer next to you forgot more than you know right now — they don't mind explaining.
2. Document as you go. Future you (and your teammates) will thank you when the postmortem rolls around.
3. Ship small, ship often. A working draft beats a perfect plan that never leaves your laptop.

What's the one lesson from your first internship? Comment below — I'm collecting these for a longer writeup.
